However, in the first year of the new HR commission, other casual observers could not keep up with the pace of change. The commission was created in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, and the need for thorough and comprehensive investigations was urgent. The Y2K crisis had come and gone, and the need for immediate action was clear. The commission was tasked with investigating the attacks and determining how to prevent future incidents.

The commission's work was intense and demanding. Members worked long hours and were subjected to intense scrutiny. The commission's findings were widely anticipated and were expected to have far-reaching implications for national security and the way in which the government operates.

In the end, the commission's report was a comprehensive analysis of the attacks and their causes. The report recommended a number of changes to the way in which the government operates, including increased funding for intelligence agencies and increased cooperation between government agencies.

The commission's work was not without its critics, however. Some argued that the commission's findings were too broad and did not provide enough detail about the attacks themselves. Others argued that the commission's recommendations were too vague and did not provide enough guidance for policymakers.

Despite these criticisms, the commission's work was widely praised for its thoroughness and its dedication to finding the truth about the attacks. The commission's report is widely regarded as one of the most important documents of the 21st century, and its recommendations continue to shape the way in which the government operates.
